THE SPELLING SCHOOL.

His name was Ephraim, modest, not specially renowned, except as a champion speller in his country school. Orthographic aptitude was not to be found in his family. At any spelling match where they encountered Ephraim.

The spelling-book he had by heart, and the dictionary. And when, at his tongue's end, did the vocabulary. The dictionary was a book of a door with perfect ease. And through words acquired like lightning through a cloud.

You could not trace a spell, with any common alphabet. By which a captive Ephraim, did him to a spelling match. And his admirers frequently remarked of Ephraim, that he could spell the Chinese alphabet from a sheet of tea.

The people seemed to find in spelling school their wretched lot. When he was there against this orthographic spelling book. That moved down all before it, with a rattling failure. Of consonants and vowels punctuated every word.

Just at the conclusion of Ephraim's recitation. The book fell in a spelling-error in an adjoining town. But not the sole survivor of that orthographic school. Verses Ephraim and a school girl, his sole companion.

With equal ardour, 'twixt these two, waged the unequal fight. Wherever might perchance, at last, was quite indecise. With equal ardour, 'twixt these two, waged the unequal fight. The indecisive battle, and the death-struggle, was decided.

In vain the wind and wailing spells upon that girl were cast. The wailing letters dropped from her lips so fast. The wailing letters dropped from her lips so fast. The wailing letters dropped from her lips so fast.

The million was excited. "Stick to him, Sir!" some cried. And "Go it, Ephraim!" his patrons loudly replied. But Ephraim, was the best of humbled school boys. And, on the whole, his prestige made him a favourite in the pews.

In fact, though, they were having for Ephraim, he got the word, at last, that dropped him as if he had been shot. The word that checked the wailing letters, more from fear than from a "frown."

Confused his tongue as Ephraim, a word without a vowel. An ash on his tongue as Ephraim, a word without a vowel. An ash on his tongue as Ephraim, a word without a vowel.

"Spelling upon a wailing edge of consonants!" gasped Ephraim. They had him with the spelling-book, and a wailing relief.

WEALTHY BEGGARS.

The seeming paradox of our title is one that every newspaper writer will recognise at sight. A child would define a beggar as a poor man in the streets, and such he is generally supposed to be—one who seeks the monetary aid of passers-by in order to get food and alleviate his condition of distressed poverty; but in this sense to apply the appellation of "Begger" to the majority of our thoroughfares is more than a misnomer—it is a sympathetic distinction most undeserably applied.

It is not probable, however, that they themselves will quarrel with the term, notwithstanding that it is the very lowest grade in the desecrated social scale which we distinguish by a name for in truth their title in connection with the crafty arrangement of their intentionally empty clothing, which produces such marked effect upon our compassionate sensibilities, forms their stock in trade. To designate them anything but "Beggars" would be to reduce their work of charity simply to the outward show of ragged and shabby, and a wonderfully artistic study of effect in the eyes of the passer-by.

It is no intention of ours to despise that poverty which honourably belongs to the beings whom Fortune has deserted and reduced from easy competency to a condition of objects indigence. Such cases command themselves to our most sincere sympathies, and we consider that we render them a service by directing attention to the state of the unfortunate who employ the craft of poverty to their own fraudulent ends, making street alms-giving an uncertain and most probably a misapplied act of benevolence, and bringing the general custom into such disrepute that the few worthy supplicants are looked upon with equal suspicion, as being equally unworthy.

No one would desire to breathe other than a warm, vitalising breath upon the promptings of charity, that it might spread its blessed influence a hundredfold; but the knowledge that so many impostors thrive upon the bounty of the benevolent, compels us to exercise the utmost discrimination in every instance. This species of rascality is usually despised to be confined to those who are void of all wealth, save in a keen perception for turning poverty to good account, which in another sphere would be considered a remarkable quality, inasmuch as he who can use fortune and misfortune with equal facility can boast of talents of no mean order; but we find beggars frequently possess considerable means, either gained prior to entering upon their vagrant life, or that the plea of want is from the outward unfounded—or more frequently it is the result of beggary success. Nor are the offenders solely to be found among the plebeian masses, as even good birth are at times converted into rascals of the vagabond class, the intuition of their superior intelligence, however, not being potent enough to elevate the art of mendicancy. Of the latter type we may venture an opinion that the world will not again produce an notorious and unexcusable character as Bampfylde Mooreclough, the offspring of an ancient and honorable house, whose varied professional skill and unscrupulous deceptions earned for him the exalted title of the "Begger King"; but it is not difficult to find many lesser lights, who only give place to this distinguished star in the degree of their knavery and impudence. It would be impossible to give a list of names in this department where the applicant honestly pleads for the aid of the professed beggar, as no fertile, their craft and language so plausible and guarded, and the astute cunning of their whole plan so complete, that they become difficult of detection.

We lately had occasion to test the veracity of a woman having all the outward show of a quiet, reduced respectability, who tearfully pleaded for the means to bury her "poor dead child," to save the indignities of parochial interference. Our journey with the distinguished parent led us to a decent abode, where we observed the woman—who had gone forward bravely and pulled down the blind, the token of death within, but not as at the door with an apology that the key of the room where the corpse lay could not be found. Fraud naturally presented itself to our mind, but, acknowledging the dilemma, we promised another visit to secure ourself, and passed out, casually inquiring if her child was the soldier who had been in the war. The imposture she at once proved by pointing out the young woman among half a dozen others cowering in the gutter, his bright little face dispelling the pallor of death, with which we had already associated him.

To-day the capricious fancy of the beggar will cause him to don the sombre dignity of a shabby clerical costume, and introducing himself at your door with the most modest of pleas, plead with his cunning hypocrisy for your "kind Christian assistance to enable him to amercise the condition of the poor and needy of the district," which "distress" compels him to solicit and entreat himself, and your leniency is applied accordingly.

Another guise is that of reduced gentility. Exquisite cleanliness is here indispensable, and the aid of aristocratic apparel—a bargain from a wardrobe dealer—is so brushed that the rust of time almost disappears, and it is fairly possible to mistake the beggar for the great glow of his past. Headless of his peering finger-tips, which are still
